of these big companies. I can give more such instances how wrong things are being done in this Ministry, by this Government and foreign exchange is being wasted. So, Sir, instead of talking about this kind of canalisation and in actual practice being influenced by powerful vested interests and valuable foreign exchange being wasted and failing to explore new markets and pushing up our exports, things to-day are going to pieces. We are in a very pitiable position and Government has to take certain basic decisions in this matter and I would like to repeat that one of the basic decisions should be the nationalisation of export and import trade. Canalisation of import of certain commodities cannot substitute the nationalisation of import and export trade. And such other steps also to organise the industry in the country on a new basis for the production of items of export have to be taken. I have no time to go into these details. All these things have to be given a new look, an entirely new look. Also a departure is what is called for, not tinkering here and there. That is what I have to suggest to this Government.
